Draft program outline

Peasants and others working in rural areas, like fisherfolk, shepherds and rural workers, represent the largest group of people in the world suffering from hunger, discrimination, lack of prospects, public negligence and cultural odium. In the light of this situation the United Nations Human Rights Council UNHRC undertook several studies that ultimately asserted the need for an international protection instrument. An intergovernmental working group was created to work on a draft declaration. The first draft was completed in 2012, based on La Via Campesina proposal. Three rounds of negotiations have followed these drafts. The current challenge is to pressure the states to actively involve themselves in the process.

Social movements from farmers and other civil societal organizations working on the issues of food and agriculture, human rights and development are alert to the fact that existing universal instruments to protect their livelihoods and culture are not sufficient. The specific situation of working in the country side to make the living from the use of natural resources is under multiple stress factors. They advocate heavily for the adoption of an international charter of this kind and have their own proposals that go beyond the present declaration.

The planned congress will bring activists from around the world together for three days to exchange the concerns, make the wider public aware of the issue and get organized for effective steps to advocate for real peasants' rights. More than 100 peasant leaders are expected to come to the small town Schwäbisch Hall to make a real impact in safeguarding their peoples rights amidst the mounting pressure put on their resources and lifestyles by globalization forces, modernization efforts and reckless agribusiness.
